ABSTRACT

This conference presents a study that examines gender differences in labor informality at the regional level in Argentina between 2016 and 2024. By analyzing informality indicators across sex, region, education, employment intensity, poverty, and income, the results show that informality is not consistently higher among women and varies across time and regions. While a post-pandemic shift appears to have disadvantaged women, the findings suggest that education and income levels play a more decisive role than gender alone in explaining informality patterns. The session will be in Spanish with automatic translation into English for those who need it.
