ABSTRACT

This discussion analyses the urban popular economies of Jujuy (2020-2024) from an anthropological perspective that integrates gender, identity, and temporalities. Using an ethnographic approach, it examines how these economies articulate the daily reproduction of life, political-generational processes, and Andean cultural matrices. From a feminist economic perspective, it argues that they are not only a productive sector, but also a social configuration that politicises social reproduction and redefines the relationship between work, culture, and citizenship in the Global South. The session will be in Spanish with automatic translation into English for those who need it.
