ABSTRACT

This discussion examines recent reforms regulating paid domestic work in Mexico, including the IMSS pilot program (2019) and subsequent legal changes mandating social security registration. Focusing on the period 2019-2024, the study assesses whether these measures have improved formalization and working conditions in this highly feminized sector. The findings show modest and slow progress in registration rates, with persistent gender gaps and limited overall impact. The session will be in Spanish with automatic translation into English for those who need it.
